

Phobia, Triflex, and Threats

Fear and the Triplex System

Fear has been around since our births. Some scientists say it's genetic while others say it is a learned behavior. Regardless of ideologies, we cannot deny the existence of an invisible force that pulls or pushes us away from things that are real or unreal.

Here at eonteous, we decided to assign classifications to phobias. The triplex system is designed to help with determining the threat level they possess towards humans. It should allow psychologists, social workers, and many more to gain a greater understanding of which phobias pose the highest threats.

Triplex System: a system designed to assess and classify a user's most critical points of Love, Hate, and Fear. Triplex also determines constructs of Love, Hate, and Fear.

A part of the system scales phobias on a ranked criterion. Triplex uses a class system. For example, arachibutyrophobia (fear of peanut butter) is something that people can manage. So, arachibutyrophobia is ranked as class 1. Now, a class 5 would be hydrophobia (fear of water) because you need water to survive as a human.

Classification

Class 1 | minimal impact on human survivability; human functions carry out slightly abnormal.

Class 2 | moderate impact on human survivability; not being able to carry out some human functions

Class 3 | high impact on human survivability; most human functions will not be executed.

Class 4 | significant threat to human survivability; intervention is necessary.

Class 5 | may result in inevitable death; must seek human intervention.
